11 or its med in the repositories Guessing it's likely that they are gone from the repo. You have to find it and you have to find it fast. I would guess that the post here would be best. Good luck. I don't see the point in getting a free version of dddl when most of the people want to use it for commercial purposes, it is very bad to compromise a product in this way, and this is an example of what happens when you put a non-FOSS version into the wild. There are many cases where this happens: the copyright holder is not the manufacturer, the manufacturer is not the copyright holder, there are intermediate parties. It is not about choice, it is about a choice which someone else has made which you can not participate in, for instance, or because it is contrary to your own interests. My answer has been put on the web site of the company. I don't know if it will help you. What I find upsetting is that nothing is done about this, when there is a documented way of dealing with it. I agree with you. The GPL violation and the fact that it was FOSS is a clear cut case of copyright infringement, with a simple technical fix and the opportunity to take it up with a new license. Why did no one do that? The idea that dddl is in violation of GPL is probably hard to prove. Any code can be considered to be derivative of the original, even if it's quite different. Any code which wants to provide 82157476af
